

One City, Twin Crises: Vacancy in Philadelphia

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania is the sixth largest city (by population) in the United States, with 1.6 million residents. Since reaching its population zenith in the 1950s with 2.07 million people, the city has seen a decrease of about 500,000 people. Vacancy follows population decline, and there are innumerable parcels in city limits. Though city government releases their estimated number of vacant properties annually, the model used is wildly inaccurate. Regardless, we can use the data to see that there are two distinct spatial patterns of vacancy: where there has been a loss of residents, and where there has been a loss of industry (as shown by larger average property size).
